

The Future of the Asia-Pacific

Admiral Samuel J. Locklear III
U.S. Navy Commander
U.S. Pacific Command

For decades, American power in the Asia-Pacific has sustained a geopolitical order that has brought stability and prosperity to the entire region. But, what does the future hold? The rapidly changing balance of power and persistent security threats presents increasing demands for American leadership. In turn, we increasingly look to our allies and partners to play a more active role. If the Indo-Asia-Pacific hopes to continue the economic miracle of the past 40 years, we must embrace a new engagement strategy that prioritizes economic sustainability, multilateral diplomacy and a security architecture based on a rules-based international order that provides assured access to the shared domains.

Friday, November 21 - RSVP required by November 19

12:00p.m. - 1:30p.m.

<http://aparc.fsi.stanford.edu/events/registration/218223>

Oksenberg Conference Room

Encina Hall, 3rd floor, Central

For more information contact Ms. Debbie Warren, dawarren@stanford.edu or 650-723-8387.

This event is free and open to the public.

Stanford

APARC Walter H. Shorenstein
Asia-Pacific
Research Center

CISAC Center for International Security and Cooperation

FSI Freeman Spogli
Institute for International Studies